[From an Irish Paper] WORDS.

Words, household words, that linger on When household love is past, And keep our childhood's tender tone About us to the lest; Like pleasant streams that murmer yet, Of valleys fair and green, And make the pilgrim's heart forget The deserts aprend between; For sin and sorrow have no part In that bright Enne of the heart.

Words, words of hope-oh, long believed As oracles of old! When stars of promise have deceived, And beacon-fires grow cold; Though still upon Time's stormy steeps Such sounds are faint and few, Yet oft from cold and stranger lips Hath failen that blessed dew, That like the rock-kept rain remain'd, When many a fairer fount was drain'd

Words, words of love,-the ocean pearl May s'umber far and deep, Though tempests wake or breezes curl The wave that hides its sleep; So deep in Memory's hidden cells, The winds of Life pass o'er These treasured words whose music swells Perchance for us no more: But Memnon-like, its echoes fill The early rained temples still.

Words, mighty words, we see your power Where'er the sun looks down On forest tree or fortress tower, Or desert bare and brown; The power that by old Tiber's wave, Could rouse the Roman ire, and wake to war the Indian Brave, Beside his council fire, Or call the flower of Gothic shields To find their rest in Syrian fields.

And yet that power is with us still, To wake the ways of strife, Or breathe in tones of love that thrill The sweetest chords of life; But, if from mortal lips are poured Such spells of wondrous might, What glorious wisdom filled his word Who spake-AND THERE WAS LIGHT! Well may that mighty Word, restore The morning of the world once more ENERGY.—Energy is omnipotent. The clouds that surrounded the houseless boy to-day are dispersed, and he is invited to a palace. It is the work of energy. The child who is a beggar this moment, in a few years to come may stand forth the admiration of the clouds that surrounded the houseless boy to-be clouds the houseless boy to-be clouds that surrounded the houseless boy to-be clouds the houseless b to come may stand forth the admiration of angels. Who has not seen the life-given power of energy? It makes the wilderness to blossom as the rose; whitens the ocean; navigates our rivers; levels mountains; paves with iron a highway from State to State, and sends thought with speed of lightning from one extremity of the land to the other.
